https://doi.org/10.1017/S1537781411000545 Published online by Cambridge University Press

Contributors, January 2012 (11.1)

Christopher D. Cantwell is a PhD candidate in the History Department at Cornell University and assistant director of the Dr. William M. Scholl Center for American History and Culture at the Newberry Library in Chicago.

Hasia Diner is a professor of history and Hebrew and Judaic studies at New York University. Her most recent book, We Remember with Reverence and Love: American Jew and the Myth of Silence after the Holocaust, won the National Jewish Book Award in 2010 and the Saul Viener Prize of the American Jewish Historical Society in 2011. The essay in this issue is a revision of her Distinguished Historian address to the Society for Historians of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era in March 2011.

Philip J. Dreyfus is an associate professor of history at San Francisco State University, where he teaches courses in environmental, urban, and labor history with a focus on the U.S. West. He is the author of Our Better Nature: Environment and the Making of San Francisco (2008) and is working on an environmental history of the United States.

Alison Clark Efford, an assistant professor at Marquette University, is working on a book that explores how German immigrants influenced the reshaping of American citizenship during Reconstruction. Her essays have appeared in the Missouri Historical Review, the Bulletin of the German Historical Institute, and the Marquette Law Review.

Ann Norton Greene is in the Department of History and Sociology of Science at the University of Pennsylvania. She has written on veterinary medicine and urban wildlife, with publications including Horses at Work: Harnessing Power in Industrial America (2008). She is beginning a project on science, energy, and technology in Progressive Era agriculture.

Julia Guarneri is a PhD candidate in the history department at Yale University. She is at work on a dissertation, "Making Metropolitans: Newspapers and Urban Life in America, 1880–1930."

Malcolm D. Magee is director of the Institute for the Study of Christianity and Culture in Lansing, Michigan, and a visiting faculty member in the Department of History at Michigan State University. He is the author of What The World Should Be: Woodrow Wilson and the Crafting of a Faith-Based Foreign Policy (2008).

Nikki Mandell is an associate professor of history at the University of Wisconsin—Whitewater. Her most recent book, co-authored with Bobbie Malone, is Thinking Like a Historian: Rethinking History Instruction (2008). Her first book, The Corporation as Family: The Gendering of Corporate Welfare, 1890–1930, was published in 2002.

Katherine Leonard Turner is a visiting assistant professor of history at Philadelphia University. Her book project, How the Other Half Ate, examines food and cooking in working-class America in the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries.

Lara Vapnek is an assistant professor of history at St. John's University and the author of Breadwinners: Working Women and Economic Independence, 1865–1920 (2009). She is working on two projects: a short biography of Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and a study of wet-nursing in nineteenth-century New York City that examines motherhood, social class, and state formation.

https://doi.org/10.1017/S1537781411000545 Published online by Cambridge University Press