Seeking Global Climate Justice

This book offers a critical exploration of climate justice, bringing together diverse perspectives from a wide range of regions and disciplines, including law, political science, anthropology, environmental sciences, and economics. It addresses the intersection of environmental, social, and economic issues, highlighting the profound inequalities amplified by the climate crisis. Through theoretical critiques and concrete case studies from different regions, the book emphasizes how global politics shape local realities and showcases the voices of those resisting structural injustices. It not only deepens the understanding of climate justice but also proposes practical solutions and alternatives, making it a valuable resource for students, researchers, and practitioners in the fields of climate change, human rights, development, and social movements. With its interdisciplinary approach and global scope, this book will appeal to anyone seeking to engage critically and constructively with the most pressing issues of our time.

Mirka Fries is a PhD researcher in business and human rights at Friedrich Alexander Universität (FAU) Erlangen-Nürnberg. Her work examines how law shapes inequality, focusing on intellectual property, trade law, and corporate accountability. Apart from her academic work, she has experience in strategic litigation. Drawing on feminist and decolonial theory, she explores law's potential for social and environmental justice. She teaches intellectual property (IP) law at Wageningen University and Research (WUR).

Jakob Nehls is a PhD researcher at Friedrich Alexander Universität (FAU) Erlangen-Nürnberg. His work examines the nexus of human rights and the climate crisis, alongside theoretical reflections on human rights within business and human rights discourse. Beyond academia, he has worked with various organizations advocating for human rights. Among other roles, he contributed to building Amnesty International Germany's climate-related human rights work and hosted a podcast for SOS Children's Villages.
