ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am deeply indebted to Francis Hare, Earl of Listowel, for giving me permission to edit his father's memoirs for publication. Francis very generously responded to my query regarding the existence of the memoirs and immediately gave me a copy and expressed sincere happiness that the work would finally be published and reach a wider audience. Professor Emma Griffin and her successor Professor Richard Toye have both been wonderful Literary Directors at the Royal Historical Society and I am so pleased they have allowed me to include this work within the Society's invaluable Camden Series. They have also generously been very understanding with my tardiness and consistently supportive both in their official role and as British historians themselves. I am very grateful to Dr Emile Chabal and Dr Donal Lowry for advising me generously on some factual queries. My deepest debt is to Lady Diana Voss who has been a great source of help and kindness in giving every assistance to me in getting her father's fascinating story published without seeking to direct or control my role as editor. I thank her most sincerely for not only getting family papers ready for me and answering queries, but also for facilitating the permission to reproduce letters between Lord Listowel and Lord Mountbatten concerning the final months of British rule in India. Lord Listowel himself made his own acknowledgments in his preface to the memoirs which follows my introduction. I was a schoolboy in New Zealand when Lord Listowel died in March 1997 and never knew him. I first came across his name working as a university student in the New Zealand National Archives in Wellington, where there were official papers describing his visit to the country in early 1949 to try and convince the sceptical Labour Prime Minister, Peter Fraser, and members of the New Zealand Civil Service that a republican India should be welcomed into the Commonwealth despite not keeping George VI as head of state like all the other members. I was intrigued by this young Fabian aristocrat and struck by his quiet courtesy and this curiosity duly increased as I looked further at the variety of missions and roles he held. It is my hope that historians and interested readers will share the opinion of the Listowel family and my own that these memoirs and the related material are of immense historical value and add a crucial and previously unpublished witness account to many of the great events and episodes in twentieth-century British history, all told with a lightness of touch and a gentle elegance that cloaked a steadfast determination to serve, and to make the world more decent and just.
