Sharing the Wealth: Member Contributions and the Exchange Theory of Party Influence in the U.S. House of Representatives

Damon Cann
SUNY Press

While students of American politics are accustomed to thinking of members of Congress as recipients of campaign contributions, Sharing the Wealth shows that incumbents are increasingly active as contributors to their parties and other political candidates. As this study shows, member contributions have grown exponentially in recent years to finance the fierce biannual battle for majority control of Congress. Utilizing both quantitative methods and case studies, Cann examines arrangements designed to advance ambitions of individuals while ultimately strengthening parties, and also explores several important consequences of this growing phenomenon.

Cann is an assistant professor of political science at the Utah State University.
