The Practice of Satire in England, 1658–1770

Ashley Marshall

"Marshall is completely in control of her vast materials . . . Exceptional cases are not her subject; hers is the much broader one of satire across-the-board, whether we call it lampoon or tirade, punitive or educative, merely entertaining or even affectionate; and her subject is one that has never been systematically dealt with."

Sounding Imperial

Poetic Voice and the Politics of Empire, 1730–1820

James Mulholland

"Mulholland's superbly composed book reanimates eighteenth-century visions of poetic practices 'elsewhere' and details their shaping role in British poetics. His account of the remaking of oral or folk traditions within the conventions of poetry links poetic voice to the cultural exigencies of empire in remarkably inventive ways; this book will reenergize the study of eighteenth-century British poetry."
