My first debt is to Keith Wrightson. If this book achieves half his craft and insight then it will have been worth writing. By recent, RAE-driven standards it is a book with a somewhat convoluted history. Although its genesis can be traced to my Ph.D. thesis, the final product is (thankfully) very much removed from its origins. Along the way, Peter Borsay, David Ditchburn, Elizabeth Hallam, Andrew Mackillop, John Morrill, Jane Ohlmeyer, Cathy Shrank, Micheal O'Siochru, and David Rollison read early (in some cases foetal) drafts of chapters and made valuable comments. Its writing has also benefited from the conversation and support of other friends and colleagues, whether they know it or not. They include Geoff Baldwin, Dermot Cavanagh, Alan Cromartie, Isabel Davis, Adam Fox, Henry French, Andy Gordon, Steve Hindle, Jean Howard, Tim Ingold, Joanna Innes, Mark Knights, Peter Kirby, Mary Morrissey, Ed Muir, Craig Muldrew, Tom Nichols, Arlene Oak, Alan Orr, Markku Peltonen, Sarah Rees-Jones, David Scott, Alexandra Shepard, Paul Slack, Naomi Tadmor, Robert Tittler, John Walter, Andy Wood, and Steve Zwicker. Mary Laven and Jason Scott Warren kindly let me stay with them while finishing my research in York, as did Jennifer Richards and Dermot Cavanagh in Newcastle. Especial thanks go to Jennifer Richards and David Clemis, whose friendship and enthusiasms reminded me at regular intervals why I was writing the book in the first place. David Ditchburn read half of the final draft and Cathy Shrank and Keith Wrightson read it all. The final result is, of course, entirely of my own making.

There are institutional debts. A research fellowship at Jesus College, Cambridge gave me the initial space to gather my thoughts; and the University of Aberdeen has subsequently provided invaluable support – in particular, the time and money to test chapters at seminars and conferences, and its commitment to both Cultural History and the Centre for Early Modern Studies. Even then it is doubtful the book would have been written without an AHRB Research Grant in 2002–3. As important have been the many librarians and archivists who have helped me on my sometimes tortuous way. Sue Hubbard in the Herefordshire County Record Office and Claire Welford at Cambridge University Library helped with particular references. The staff at the Shropshire Archives in Shrewsbury have always been extremely helpful and friendly on my numerous visits. So, too, have those at the Berkshire Record Office, Borthwick Institute of Historical Research, British Library, Brymor Jones Library, East Sussex Record Office, Corporation of London Record Office, Cambridgeshire County Record Office, Devonshire Record Office, Huntingdon Record Office, North Yorkshire County Record Office, Post Office Record Office, Public Record Office in Kew, Sheepscar Library, and Tyne and Wear Archives. However, my biggest thanks go to where it all started – with Rita Freeman and the staff and volunteers at the York City Archives, a unique and wonderful institution. I'd like to thank Elizabeth Howard at Cambridge University Press for trusting me with a contract and the series editors for advising her to do so. I'd also like to thank Isabelle Dambricourt, Jackie Warren, Jo North and Val Howard and all the other people involved in the production of this book for their skill and patience. Alison Sandison drew the maps and Neil Curtis, curator of the Marischal Museum, introduced me to the unusual Commonwealth coin in his care.

I'd like to thank, finally, my family: Lynda and Barry Withington for their continual support; Lucy and Alan Shrank for their generosity, hospitality, and interest, especially on my research trips to Shropshire; and the Turons for living near Huntingdon. The last debt is the greatest. Whether providing references and translations, discussing ideas, or reading yet another draft of a chapter, Cathy Shrank has shared in this project from the outset.

All dates and spellings have been modernised.
