divided into two groups, comprising simple voice fatigue and organic disease; the author classifies the latter according as they affect the lungs, the larynx, or the resonance cavities. The chapter on semeiology takes the form of a general review of voice affections attendant on various diseases of the vocal system. A special chapter is devoted to the hygiene of the voice, and a detailed bibliography completes a very practical treatise.

Practical Medicine Series: Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Section, vol. iii, 1907. The Year Book Publishers, Chicago. G. Gillies & Co., 28, Gibson Street, Hillhead, Glasgow.

The Practical Medicine Series of Year Books for 1907 consists of ten volumes containing much that is of interest to practitioners who wish to keep in touch with advances in medicine and surgery.

In this country we are familiar with medical annuals, and it is interesting to see the works published on the other side of the Atlantic. The publishers of this series arrange to sell the works separately, if required, and the names of those in charge of each department are sufficient guarantee of their capacity to undertake the work. The publishers claim that for five years it has been their sole endeavour to develop a series of books that would present the year's medical progress in the most serviceable and attractive form to meet perfectly the needs of the active physician, and the volume dealing with eye, ear, nose and throat which has been sent to us for review, fully justifies the claims made for it. The work done in 1906 is very well reviewed and abstracted, and the general practitioner can easily make himself acquainted with the most important developments by a study of the different sections. There can be no doubt the editors, Drs. Casey A. Wood, Albert H. Andrews, and Gustavus P. Head, have done their work well, and the volume should be well received by the profession.
