A note from the Editors

Over the past ten years, Bilingualism: Language and Cognition has established itself as a high-standard journal in the area of bilingualism by reporting novel research findings and new theoretical positions as well as providing the research community with state of the art reports in key areas. We thank all the contributors and reviewers who have made this possible.

The article by the Founding Editor, François Grosjean, describes the origins and start-up of the Journal. Its establishment was timely because over the past ten years, the world has changed and the study of bilingualism has emerged as a mainstream area in many cognitive, linguistic, and neuroscience domains. Readers will have noticed frequent citations of papers originally published in Bilingualism in other well-established, high-impact journals. The Journal is now amongst those being indexed by ISI and its official impact figure will be available in 2008. The Journal itself is also marketed and read by researchers across the planet.

Our aim over the next ten years is to continue to provide a forum for shaping and developing the field and to help foster discoveries made possible both by technological advances (e.g. the more widespread use of non-invasive imaging technologies) and by theoretical advances in linguistics, psychology, and the neurosciences. As Editors we are keen to foster new research in novel intellectual domains and to encourage and support publications from important areas traditionally less well represented in our Journal, such as computational and neural approaches to bilingualism, and from junior scholars who seek to identify new directions of research.

We aim to keep our readership abreast of developments through Special Issues and to help provide a focus for debate through Keynote Articles and Commentaries. We welcome suggestions for these both from our Editorial Board and from our wider readership.
