John Butt (john.butt@glasgow.ac.uk) is Gardiner Professor of Music at the University of Glasgow. His work centres on music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but he is also concerned with the implications of the past in our present culture. He is the author of five monographs and has been the director or soloist on some 25 recordings. He has received the OBE, FBA and FRSE, and has been awarded the Dent Medal, the RAM/Kohn Foundation's Bach Prize and the RCO medal.

Simon Clarke (simon.clarke@rncm.ac.uk), director of the RNCM's Contemporary Philosophy Research Centre (CPRC), is a philosopher and musicologist whose specialisms range from Derrida and Badiou to metal via nineteenth-century music. Active, in addition, as a composer and performer, his ensemble Vulgar Display attempts to fail to reconcile extreme metal and contemporary classical music.

Ross Cole (rgc30@cam.ac.uk) is a Junior Research Fellow at Homerton College, University of Cambridge, where he works predominantly on music of the twentieth century. He holds a Ph.D. from Cambridge, an MRes from the University of York and an MA from the University of Oxford, where he received the Gibbs Prize.

Alain Frogley (alain.frogley@uconn.edu) is Professor of Music and Associate Dean in the School of Fine Arts at the University of Connecticut. His research has centred on British music of the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, particularly Vaughan Williams, and on Beethoven. Recent interests include the relationship of music and the imperial metropolis, British music in Nazi Germany and racial Anglo-Saxonism in American music. His critical edition of Vaughan Williams's Ninth Symphony for Oxford University Press has recently been published.

Marina Frolova-Walker (mfw263@googlemail.com) is Professor of Music History at the Faculty of Music, University of Cambridge, and Fellow of Clare College. She is the author of Russian Music and Nationalism from Glinka to Stalin (Yale University Press, 2007) and Stalin's Music Prize: Soviet Culture and Politics (Yale University Press, 2016), and co-author (with Jonathan Walker) of Music and Soviet Power, 1917–32 (Boydell Press, 2012). In 2015 she was awarded the Dent Medal.

John Irving (j.irving@trinitylaban.ac.uk) is Professor of Performance Practice at Trinity Laban Conservatoire of Music and Dance, London. He is an established performer on early keyboards (notably fortepiano, on which he has recorded several CDs), specializing in music of the later eighteenth century. Previously Director of the Institute of Musical Research at London University, he has published six books on Mozart, including major written and performance contributions to the internationally acclaimed The Mozart Project (a digital book for iPad).

Shane McMahon (mcmahon.ks@gmail.com) is a Research Associate of the Humanities Institute at University College Dublin, where his research explores aspects of Western music history through the frameworks of global history, deep history and anthropology. He is a former Irish Research Council Postgraduate Scholar and received his Ph.D. in historical musicology from UCD in 2015.

Maria Anne Purciello (mpurciel@udel.edu) is an Assistant Professor of Music History at the University of Delaware. Her research focuses on the development of the operatic genre in seventeenth-century Italy, with particular emphasis on the musical and dramatic manifestation of comedy.

Mareli Stolp (marelistolp@hotmail.com) completed degrees in piano performance at the University of Pretoria and the Conservatorium van Amsterdam, and received a Ph.D. in artistic research from Stellenbosch University in 2012. Her main research interests include artistic research; music and society; music and politics; and South African music history.

Ian Woodfield (i.woodfield@qub.ac.uk) teaches early repertoire and notation at Queen's University Belfast. He has recently completed a study for Oxford University Press, entitled Cabals and Satires, of the political context of Mozart's three Da Ponte operas.
