The subject of this dissertation was suggested to the author by Professor Gustav Neckel of the University of Berlin, with whom he had begun the study of Old Norse during his stay abroad as Fellow of the Germanistic Society of America, 1928–29. On his return to America, the author was enrolled in the Graduate School of Cornell University in February, 1931, where he completed his studies for the Doctorate of Philosophy, under the special guidance of Professor A. L. Andrews. To him he here extends his sincere gratitude for help and advice, and for the friendly interest that he has at all times displayed in the progress of this work.
