light plugs, and other accessories. There is also a tailoring shop and power weaving section. Each prisoner was able to earn money, which was available to him on his discharge. A radio diffusion set with extension speakers provided music throughout the prison. There was a small six-bed ward, with single rooms for the more agitated or disturbed patients.

This prison served as the remand unit for the local area, the remand prisoners not being allowed to associate with the other prisoners.

It would appear that this unit exists in the absence of proper accommodation under the Social Defence system, and that when such accommodation becomes available this particular unit would no longer be required.
