ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many institutions, colleagues, and friends have helped bring this volume together. The seeds began at the University of Wisconsin-Madison in 2009; they grew significantly during a stay at Durham University from 2012 to 2014; they bear fruit finally at the University of Nottingham now in 2015. I am grateful to all three universities for the opportunity to work on this project, grateful to the library staffs and interlibrary loan departments who consistently accepted and processed hundreds of my requests. I have been lucky to fall on my feet here in Nottingham, where new friends and colleagues have managed to make me feel at home in a matter of months, this despite consistently pointing out my unconscious Americanisms. The archives in which these documents are found deserve thanks not only for permission to publish but also for the courteous service I received while in situ. The British Library is justifiably a magnet for many early modernists, but Lambeth Palace Library has a wonderful charm all its own, the Huntington offers an idyllic setting in an otherwise busy environment, and the National Library of Scotland felt a home away from home for a time. For fellowship support during the research and writing, I am grateful to the University of Wisconsin-Madison's Department of History, the European Union's COFUND/Marie Curie Actions, and the Huntington Library.

In June 2013, a conversation with Anthony Milton about these documents led me to press on with the project in earnest; I am grateful to him for the firm nudge to do so, and for offering suggestions before publication. Several others read individual documents or the whole kit and caboodle during the final months. As may not be surprising, Simon Adams is owed significant gratitude for his close eye and critical commentary on all aspects of the volume, though I am also thankful for the time, thoughts, and assistance of Charles Gunnoe, Robert Kolb, Paul Lockhart, Nicholas Popper, Tracey Sowerby, and Peter Wilson. Many others supplied help when I was stuck with a particular detail in a manuscript, and here Julia Barrow and Simon Litchfield deserve notice. Still others sent me photographs and scans of materials to which I did not have access; Paulina Kewes is owed thanks for photographs from the Huntington (I shall never know why I did not photograph Daniel Rogers's volume of poetry while I was at the Huntington myself), while Andras Kisery is similarly thanked for a scan of a little-known item published in the Danske Magazin over a century ago. I have used unpublished doctoral theses available via the British Library's EThOS, without which this edition would have suffered; I am thankful to those authors whether I have been able to contact them personally or not. Along these lines a firm sense of gratitude is borne for Cynthia Fry and Lizzy Williamson, both of whom sent me their theses long before they become available on EThOS. At both institutional and individual levels, Cambridge University Press and my copy editor, Miranda Bethell, have been nothing short of world class. I cannot commend them highly enough.

For her steadfast patience when listening to my endless tales and countless bouts of frustration during the past few years, Katie deserves far more than any acknowledgement can provide. Even when I droned on well past the point she stopped listening, she always appeared to be. For his consistent indifference to academic concerns and unwavering resolve to sit (if not sleep) on my papers, Arthur is to be thanked for reminding me that sometimes we need to pull back from the details and rigour of research, and simply enjoy some time in the sun. During my first year at the University of Nottingham, I subjected the final-year students of my Special Subject to some of these documents and much of the scholarship cited in the notes. Whether they realize it or not, their colourful commentary and dynamic discussions in seminar helped me make connections and maintain positivity in the home stretch. Students, along with the taxpayers supporting education here in the UK and back home in the USA, deserve special thanks, for without them this volume would never have happened, and without them I would not be where I am today.
