unions, religious leaders and those who have given outstanding service to the country. This effort to provide an element within the electoral system that enables representatives from a broad range of civil society who might not otherwise be in such a position to obtain parliamentary representation is surely one worth considering by South Africa.

As Kotze rightly points out, "the choice of an electoral system is one of the most important aspects of the consolidation of democracy in South Africa" (p.111). Overall, this book makes a useful contribution to this debate. Its failure to consider the position in other African countries is a pity but emphasises the importance of encouraging South Africans to look to their neighbours for ideas and assistance.
