GROUP THERAPY FOR SOCIAL IMPACT: INNOVATION IN LEADERSHIP TRAINING (September-October, 1967).

Edited by Wm. Fawcett Hill, Project Director, Youth Studies Center, University of Southern California.

A demonstration of the fact that social agency personnel, other than clinical psychologists and psychiatrists, can learn to do group therapy through a brief in-service training course. To demonstrate the feasibility of this idea, a training course was adopted, and adapted for probation department personnel. The fifty-hour training course (and a modified "ideal" course) is described fully—as are the results of the study (including some of the areas of institutional resistance uncovered by the authors). The study was supported over a three-year period by the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Development and the Ford Foundation.

THE JUVENILE PROBATION SYSTEM: SIMULATION FOR RESEARCH AND DECISION-MAKING (January-February, 1968).

Edited by A. W. MacEachern, Director, Youth Studies Center, University of Southern California.

This report describes in some detail a major research project in juvenile probation and its evolution into an experimental demonstration project—attempting to apply research findings to the practices of agencies with a mandate to "do something" about complex social problems. It has application to analogous social research on processes which influence societal development: in particular, large bureaucracies whose tasks (assigned to them by society) are the manipulation and control of individual lives.

The demonstration project—which included the development of a systematic technique for computer simulation of probation decisions—is an ongoing attempt to introduce social and behavioral science research directly into the working operations and training activities of a social service/treatment organization . . . in such a way as to influence, and hopefully, improve the quality of subsequent decision-making in the probation process.
