THE SOCIAL REALITY OF CRIME

RICHARD QUINNEY
New York University

The author presents a new orientation to the study of crime via a theoretical perspective by means of which research and writing in Criminology can be reinterpreted. This approach to crime consists of several related processes: how criminal definitions are formulated; how criminal definitions are applied; how behavior patterns develop in relation to criminal definitions; and how criminal conceptions are constructed. The "social reality of crime" is constantly being created.

Professor Quinney seeks a sociology of crime that fits into our own times, by explicitly dealing with the ideals of justice and individual freedom – a theory which has the power of forcing us to consider libertarian ideals. Presented here is a truly relevant study of Criminology.

Although the text is intended to be used independently, it can be successfully supplemented by the author's book of readings, Crime and Justice in Society. In addition, an innovative Instructor's Manual is available, which deals not only with questions but also with the whole concept of teaching a new Criminology.

THE POLITICS OF LOCAL JUSTICE
JAMES R. KLONOSKI
University of Oregon
ROBERT I. MENDELSOHN
Wayne State University

What is justice? Who gets justice? And how and why does one get justice in the kind and amount he does? These readings on "law and order" describe and analyze how decisions in the legal system are influenced by the local political setting in which they are made. The editors feel that justice is "distributed" by the functioning of legal instruments, in the same way as money is by business institutions, and as education is by schools.

POLITICS OF THE FEDERAL COURTS
RICHARD J. RICHARDSON
University of North Carolina
KENNETH N. VINES
State University of New York at Buffalo

This study of the federal courts examines and describes the federal court system as a political institution. Emphasis is placed on the district and circuit courts where most of the decisions in the federal court system are made and where the important issues first are shaped and defined. The role of each court, including the Supreme Court, is examined as to its distinctive place in the federal judicial process.

Would you like to know how people are analyzing today's social science data?

If you need to know how the mass of today's social data is being handled, one or all of these Wiley-Interscience books will interest you.

THE LOGIC OF COMPARATIVE SOCIAL INQUIRY

By Adam Przeworski, Washington University; and Henry Teune, University of Pennsylvania.

Comparative Studies in Behavioral Science series, edited by Robert T. Holt and John E. Turner, both of the University of Minnesota. This book is organized into two parts. Part I shows that the problem of testing general theories results from the introduction of the names of specific systems into analyses. To solve this problem, the authors undertake the transformation of unexplained variances resulting from the names of specific systems into general variables. Part II deals with the problem that arises from the fact that observations are made within the context of specific systems. To solve this problem, the authors suggest interpreting the "meaning" of specific indicators within the context of specific systems.

THE ANALYSIS OF COMMUNICATION CONTENT Developments in Scientific Theories and Computer Techniques

Edited by George Gerbner, University of Pennsylvania; Ole R. Holsti, University of British Columbia; Klaus Krippendorff, University of Pennsylvania; William J. Paisley, Stanford University; and Philip J. Stone, Harvard University.

This new book was compiled to provide a comprehensive account of the present state of content analysis, and to show its significance as a developing discipline. The individual authors in the book have written their papers with two types of readers in mind: content analysis researchers, and scholars in other fields who wish to assess the applicability of content analysis to their discipline. 1969. 597 pp. $14.95

Are you interested in the reconstruction of southern education, the conflict in selective service, and the philosophy behind government public relations?

These topics are covered in depth and expertly in the three Wiley-Interscience books listed below.

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF SOUTHERN EDUCATION

By Gary Orfield, University of Virginia.

"The subject of this book is the political and administrative struggle over the future of Southern education set in motion by passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. My basic conclusion is that the institutions of American federalism and the popular beliefs associated with them made long-term national intervention in local race relations possible only under the most extraordinary conditions. The best that can be expected within the normal pattern of political relationships is a temporary use of Federal power against the local status quo... Even a brief exercise of national authority can relieve local leaders of the political burdens of implementing a deeply resented change and can create a new status quo which some local leaders will defend."–from the preface

1969. 376 pp. $9.95

SELECTIVE SERVICE: Conflict and Compromise

By Harry Marmion,
President, St. Xavier College.

"The most up-to-date book of its kind... Marmion occasionally inserts value judgements in his work, but his norms are clearly stated and the practice is not frequent enough to be objectionable. One can see clearly the reasons for the unrest in this country centered in the young generation: the actions and reactions of such demigods as Mendel Rivers, Strom Thumrond, Richard Russell, Louis Hershey, and Mark Clark are spotlighted for all to see..."–Choice

1968. 242 pp. $5.95

THE VOICE OF GOVERNMENT

Edited by Ray Eldon Hiebert,
University of Maryland;
and Carlton E. Spitzer,
President, Public Affairs Communications, Inc.
Wiley Series on Government and Communication

"This book... provides a strong rationale for governmental public relations along with descriptive material on many different aspects of the government's information services... The work has special values for those involved in government information activities, and those planning a career in government... It is important for those of us who practice public relations outside of government to understand the philosophy and the rationale of the governmental information process.–The Public Relations Journal

SOCIOLOGICAL SELF-IMAGES: A Collective Portrait

edited by IRVING LOUIS HOROWITZ, Rutgers University

(1) What do you consider to be the most uniquely defining characteristics of your way of doing sociology?
(2) What is your view of the current relationship of sociological theory and social application?
(3) Who are the sociologists whom you are either influenced by or most respect? Are they the same now as in your formative years?
(4) Which of your own writings do you like best and why?
(5) What impact would you way your sociological efforts have had on reshaping the field?

In this volume, thirteen leading sociologists candidly assess modern social science—and their impact on its development—in the fascinating personal statements which comprise Sociological Self-Images. Taken together, these divergent viewpoints are, in the editor's words, "as close to an informal methodological guidebook as anything currently extant in the social science literature."

Presented in this volume are different types of sociological approaches: neo-dialectical sociology, social naturalism, mathematical model construction, exchange and balance theory, economic and political sociology, participant observation, sociologies built upon ethnography and others constructed in terms of empirical models. The contributors represent different "generations" within the discipline, differing affiliations, and varied career stages—but they have in common hard work and even harder self-reflection about such work. They also share a belief that biography and sociology are deeply connected. As the volume's editor points out: "The process of the person becoming a sociologist is intimately linked to the sociologist becoming a person. Perhaps this simple, yet elusive, truth is what most characterizes these papers."

Law and the Behavioral Sciences

by
LAWRENCE FRIEDMAN
School of Law, Stanford University and
STEWART MACAULEY
Law School, University of Wisconsin

This textbook is intended for use by students both in the social sciences and in law schools. It deals, primarily, with the ways in which the legal system affects society and in which society affects the legal system. The book reflects the view that it is important to see the legal system as an integral part of the larger social system rather than as a set of rules, procedures, and activities of officials sealed off and isolated from the rest of society.
