Cover. A melting glacier at Tsengel Khairkha, Mongolia, reveals Argali sheep remains, providing evidence for high-altitude hunting that spans more than 3000 years. The discovery illustrates how climate change is affecting archaeological sites around the world. For more information, see 'Climate change and the loss of archaeological sites and landscapes: a global perspective' by Jørgen Hollesen in this issue. The article forms part of a special section that provides a global overview of the effects of climate change on archaeological sites and landscapes, and which explores the adaptation strategies archaeologists and cultural heritage managers are developing (photograph by W. Taylor).
