On the Cover: The Great Bay Archaeological Survey (GBAS) is a community-engaged archaeological research program exploring the ways the Great Bay Estuary / P8bagok formed an important and dynamic frontier landscape in early colonial New England (ca. AD 1600—1750). GBAS's commitment to community engagement has led to cascade effects where members of the public, including private landowners, share tips and insights about possible early colonial site locations. While we bring to bear all the tools we can to advance our efforts to find and document these sites, from archival research to geospatial modeling to cutting-edge technologies like drones and GPR, our most important work is in the field conducting shovel test survey and excavation to identify and systematically document these sites. The fragments left behind have much to teach us about what life was like in this frontier during early colonialism. In this photo you see GBAS's community historian Diane Fiske, a retired legal assistant, assessing a possible find in one of thousands of shovel test pits students and community participants in GBAS have dug over the years. The photo was taking during our assessment of the early eighteenth-century Meserve Garrison site featured in this issue.
